Building and Leading Teams

Being a team leader requires skills that go beyond those of group, project, or people management. As a team leader, you help build a foundation for team performance that is based on shared purpose and trust. You must keep performance on track while dealing with the realities of team dynamics and inevitable conflicts. Many leaders say that building and leading teams is their most challenging – and the most rewarding – accomplishment.

Assessment Questions:

How functional or dysfunctional is your team? Think about the team you are leading and assess them with the questions below:

Members of my team:

- Hold themselves and others accountable for the agreements and commitments they have made;
- Can engage in productive debate without fear of disagreement;
- Buy in and commit to decisions, even when there may be some uncertainty or apprehension; and
- Are clear on their team goals and individual roles.
